A page from a book titled "Revisions and Ministers." The text is written in a formal, historical style, discussing religious organizations, mission societies, and educational institutions in the 19th century. The page includes references to specific churches, such as the Second Baptist Church and the Universalist Church, along with details on their founding dates and associated events. There is also mention of missions and educational activities, such as the Sabbath School and various educational societies. The text is a historical document, likely part of a larger collection of religious and social statistics for the period.
During the last year, there have also been erected two large brick churches: one on Hurd street, by the First Methodist Episcopal Society, called "St. Paul's Church;" the other, on John street, by the Third Congregational Society, called "John street Church."
Lowell, Jan. 1, 1840.
